Planning for the Kodiak High School rebuilding and expansion project has crossed another juncture. Last week Kodiak Island Borough Mayor Jerome Selby appointed a number of local residents to a task force to provide community review and suggestions for the project. KMXT's Maggie Wall has details.

ANNOUNCER Follow-Up:

A list of committee members is posted on KMXT's website KMXT.org.

As part of the high school rebuilding and expansion project, the borough is hoping to get as much input from the community as possible.

In a memo to the borough manager, Selby said the high school staff and others have worked long and hard with the design team to provide the team with needs and wishes of various school interests.

Selby wrote that it's time now for a broader based group of Kodiak citizens representing various stakeholder groups to meat with the community and openly discuss the values of a range of concept options.

To that end
Mayor Selby last Thursday (March 3) appointed a long list of residents to what's being called "The Citizen's Advisory Committee for the Kodiak High School Project.":

The newest person on the committee is Nelson Mira. Bob Brodie is the committee chair.

Selby says
the schools have had input, but this is the opportunity for the Kodiak community to speak up with ideas:

"This is the....as well."))

Selby said
the committee will be super busy the next couple of months:

-((School Adv Committee
3 :21 "They are going....the whole process."))
