During his time there, Myers observed that in Puerto Rico, as in Alaska, there are people who choose to live in remote places in order to separate themselves from society. When aftershocks hit the island, Myers said it was a bit of a wake-up call for people who felt insulated from the rest of the world. He said it was also a reminder of what's good in Kodiak.

"It's a reality

Myers, who is an optometrist, said he had the chance to go to Haiti but he felt that he needed to get back to work. His volunteer position in Lions Club International keeps him away from Kodiak for at least a week out of every month.
