Kodiak College has a new director. University of Alaska's Chancellor, Tom Case, announced earlier this week that Alan Fugleberg was chosen from a group of nationwide finalists for the position. He was the only local candidate to make the top three, and has been serving as the college's assistant director for academic affairs at the college since 2011, as well as working as an assistant professor.

Fugleberg holds a Master's in public administration from the University of Montana, where he worked before coming to Kodiak.

He replaces Barbara Bolson, who served as the director of Kodiak College for more than eight years. A press release from the University of Alaska Anchorage said Bolson will retire on June 30 and Fugleberg began his work as the new director this week.
